nine years. This weighty tribute to his achievements is in four parts. The first comprises a group of 'biographics' by several of his colleagues; the second consists of 54 of his papers; the third is made up of several commentaries on his contributions by a number of distinguished psychiatrists; and the fourth is a bibliography of 306 items. Together they constitute an impressive tribute to a man who, in Sir Aubrey Lewis's words, '... had a profound respect for the facts of observation, a distrust of loose speculation and transient fashions, and a critical alertness to fresh ideas and findings which might have value for the treatment as for the understanding of and prevention of mental disorder'.
