Cerebral Cavernous Malformations (CCMs) do not fall in the Spectrum of PIK3CA-Related Overgrowth (PROS)

Jun Zhang\textsuperscript{1}, Johnathan Abou-Fadel\textsuperscript{1}, Mellisa Renteria\textsuperscript{1}, Ofek Belkin\textsuperscript{1}
Bixia Chen\textsuperscript{2}, Yuan Zhu\textsuperscript{2}, Philipp Dammann\textsuperscript{2}, Daniele Rigamonti \textsuperscript{3}

\textsuperscript{1}Departments of Molecular & Translational Medicine (MTM), Texas Tech University Health Science Center El Paso (TTUHSCEP), El Paso, TX 79905 USA

\textsuperscript{2}Essen University Hospital Department of Neurosurgery Hufelandstraße 55, 45147 Essen, Germany

\textsuperscript{3}Neurosurgery, Johns Hopkins Medicine Institutions (JHMI), Baltimore, MD 21231 USA

Running title: Cerebral Cavernous Malformations are not PROS

*All correspondence:
Jun Zhang, Sc.D., Ph.D.
Department of Molecular and Translational Medicine (MTM)
Texas Tech University Health Science Center El Paso
5001 El Paso Drive, El Paso, El Paso, TX 79905
Tel: (915) 215-4197 ;
Email. Jun.zhang2000@gmail.com
Supplemental Legends

Supplemental Video 1. Illustration of dynamic pathogenesis of VeM-derived CCM model. The schematic video visually illustrates sequential events in which invasive VeM-Endothelial Cells as well as metastatic tumor cells circulate in the blood and migrate along vasculatures to reside in microvascular CCM lesions.